

A stylized map of the city of Chicago, Illinois, showing the city's layout with various colored regions and a blue background representing water. The map is oriented vertically, with the city's main body at the top and the Lake Michigan shoreline at the bottom. The city is divided into several distinct colored areas: a large grey area at the top left, a large pink area below it, a large light blue area to the right of the pink area, a large orange area at the bottom right, and a large purple area at the bottom left. A network of blue lines represents the city's streets and highways, connecting the various colored regions. The overall design is simple and abstract, focusing on the general shape and layout of the city.

An aerial photograph showing a coastal landscape. The top portion of the image displays a grid-like pattern of agricultural fields in shades of green, yellow, and brown. A dark, winding road or path runs through these fields. Below the agricultural area, there is a large, irregularly shaped body of water, likely a bay or a large pond, which appears dark blue. The shoreline is irregular, with some land protruding into the water. The bottom portion of the image shows more land, including a large, light-colored area that could be a beach or a salt flat, and some darker, possibly forested or wooded areas. The overall scene depicts a mix of natural and human-modified environments.